A first impression

The day begins at L'Azure with light spilling over the dry-stone walls and the Aegean waking up in shades of blue you won't find anywhere else. You walk through gardens of olive and wild herbs, past shaded pergolas, to the edge of a 17-metre heated infinity pool that seems to pour straight into the sea. Across the water the islands rise one after another, more than twelve of them, as if the Cyclades had gathered just for this view. Standing in 600 m² of contemporary Cycladic architecture on a gated 4,000 m² estate, you realise the outside world has been left at the gate.

As evening comes, the estate shifts its mood. A table for fourteen is laid by the pool and the BBQ pavilion starts to glow. Later there's a film in the private screening room, or a fire crackling in the living room. Each of the six en-suite bedrooms opens onto its own terrace. The master suite has a Jacuzzi and the sea at its door, and three independent guest suites give everyone their own private corner. A dedicated two-person team looks after every detail without ever being in the way. Twelve guests stay here, and each one leaves feeling the place was theirs alone.

Agios Lazaros sits on a quiet hillside between Psarou and Ornos, sheltered from the meltemi winds. From here the sun sets over Delos and the hush is broken only by the sea. Mykonos Town, the airport and the beach clubs and restaurants of Psarou are never more than ten minutes away, but up here they feel like another world.

Some homes call for more than a listing. They need to be told as a story.
